HENNIKER'S OLD PIPE

It was definitely arranged and settlednot stipulated, for Henniker was never in any condition to make stipulations; he surrendered at discretion from the very firstthat Henniker should not be divorced from his pipe. Mrs. Henniker that was to be had noticed Henniker's brier, and she said that she liked a pipe, and on several occasions she actually urged Henniker to smake it. This is undeniable. There were witnesses

Altogether she is one of the most charming of women, and although Henniker has been married to her now for nearly six months he seems to be as devoted as ever. Perhaps even more so.

The brier was really a gem from a course, so old that Henniker almost forgets how many years he had it; but he clearly recollects that its original cost was 75 cents, and he knew that no money would tempt him to part with it.

Therefore it was quite a blow to Henniker when his wife said, one evening: "Isn't that pipe getting a little strong, Tom?" He looked at her a moment, hardly understanding. "I don't mean that I mind it." she pursued. "Don't think that I meant that. It seemed to me that it was getting eort of worn out." "I guess it's good for awhile longer, said Henniker, with an attempt at cheerfulness. "It seems to burn the tobacco all "That's just like you," cried Mrs. Hen-niker, with sweet fervor. "You always try to make the best of everything and never complain. You would go on smoking that black old thing forever and never think of buying a new one as long as it held together and burned tobacco.'

"I guess that's so," said Henniker, dryly A few days after that it was Henniker's birthday, and he sat down to breakfast with a radiant face.

"Well," said Mrs. Henniker, "why don't you look at your plate instead of looking at t was a square package with an inscription. t doesn't matter what the inscription was. but it assured him that the package was his. He opened it, and after unrolling a large Mrs. Henniker said: "Now, Tom, where's quantity of tissue paper discovered a nice light-green pipe case and within the case a white, shiny meerschaum pipe.

Henniker acted very well. His expressed rapture was beyond cavil and he went straight to his tobacco jar and could hardly be prevailed upon to wait until he had eaten his breakfast before he smoked his present. When he did his wife stood by his chair and watched the filling and lighting with breathless interest. With the first puff of smoke Henniker exhaled a sigh of supreme satisfaction.

"Then you like it, dear?"
"Like it!" exclaimed Henniker. "Well!" "I wasn't sure whether you would, beas to buy a pipe before; but I knew any. way that whatever I got it would be an improvement on that old thing my poor boy has been smoking."

Henniker sighed again. "This," he said,

"is a pipe as is a pipe." It burned his tongue and it made the tobacco taste like wood shavings, but he It was not very hard for him to begin smoking that meerschaum again when he returned that evening. If it had been, Mrs. Henniker's delighted smile would have been compensation enough. But it was rather hard to have to smoke it in the big armchair after dinner. That was the particular time of all times when the old brier was dearest to his soul. Presently a bright idea occurred to him.

"Milly," he said. "I have a thought. I want to sort of consecrate this beautiful pipe of yours to this day. It is to be my birthday pipe. I shall smoke it only on the anniversary of this day. I shall put it away in my treasure drawer for the rest of the year and on my birthday I shall take it out and we will sit together and remember this evening as I smoke it. I won't take any risk of breaking it by smoking it on ordinary days. It's too fine for every

"Nothing is too fine for you, Tom," said his wife. "It was a beautiful thought, and just like you, but I shall feel hurt if you don't smoke it all the time.'

Of course, there was nothing to be said after that.

One day as Henniker was filling the meerschaum its shining surface slipped through his fingers and it fell. With a quick movement he stooped and caught it before it reached the ground, but he trembled to think of the nearness of the disaster. What if he had broken it!

The thought kept recurring to him. What if he had broken it! After awhile it did not seem so terrible, and he found himself saying, half aloud: "I wish, by the great horn spoon, that I had broken it!" and blushed, as well he might. A day or two after that-for crime is not always of mushroom growth-Henniker nasculine point of view. It was old, of dropped the meerschaum again and picked it up with-a slight dent in the side. It was a week before he had the courage to try it again, and then it dropped on a cement sidewalk. Another bruise was the only result. It was a sad ending. Hen iker was returning home after a bona-fide late session with the books at the office. He lives in a northern suburb and his house is quite a distance from the railway station. It was very dark on this particular night, but Henniker is courageous, and was not in the least alarmed when the figure of a man emerged from the gloom and stopped be-

"Beg y'r pardon, mister," said the figure. "but haven't you got a little tobacco about you? I walked from Waukegan to-day an' I haven't had a bite to eat. I ain't hungry, but I'm dead for a smoke."

It was a touching appeal. Henniker felt in his pocket, and his hand closed on the pipe. Why should he not make this poor, forlorn fellow creature happy? Could a pipe, even a wife's gift, be devoted to a nobler, holier purpose? "I haven't another cigar," he said, kindly, "but here's a pipe that you can have if you like. Help yourself to tobacco,' The tramp half emptied the pouch and returned it to Henniker with profuse expressions of gratitude.

"That's all right," said Henniker. "Got matches? All right, then. Good-night." After he had eaten his supper, for which his conscience allowed him little appetite. your pipe? Poor fellow, you must be tired

Henniker felt himself growing hot all over. He cleared his throat for the lie to come, and groped in his pocket. Nothing He tried another and, pulling out something, stared at it stupidly. It was not the brier. It was the meer-
